Gen. Bonesteel Extends Greetings:

Infantrymen To Sign For Bond Monthly

Home is not just a special day, it is a significant date in our history for many. The Infantry Day, designated on June 15, 1944, by the Secretary of War as a day on which to honor the fighting infantrymen of the Army, is observed as a day to show appreciation for the service of these soldiers. The Infantry Day is celebrated in Fort Benning, Georgia, where the Infantry School is located. The school, which is the training center for the Infantry, hosts various events and activities to honor the service of its graduates and current soldiers.

The Infantry School essay, "The Broken Mold," by Capt. Robinson, post-war bond writer, was the winning essay in the contest. Capt. Robinson's essay, which was selected as the best essay, was based on the theme of the Infantry and the role of the infantryman in the military. The essay won a $100 bond and a special dinner at the Infantry School. Capt. Robinson's essay was judged to be the most compelling and inspiring of all the essays submitted.

Ingenuity Doubles River Ferry's Speed

The story of an Army effort to put the ferry to use at a point beyond the Normandy beachhead in France is told in a recent article in the Army C tents.

The ferry was designed and built by a team of engineers and technicians at Fort Benning, Georgia, and was transferred to the Normandy beachhead by the Army Service Forces. The ferry is used to transport personnel and equipment across the River at a point that is not accessible to conventional vehicles.

The ferry was designed to transport up to 100 tons of cargo at a time, and it is capable of making multiple runs per day. The ferry is powered by four diesel engines, and it is capable of reaching speeds of up to 15 knots.

The ferry was designed to be easily dismantled and reassembled, making it ideal for use in areas where conventional vehicles cannot operate.

 Infantry Day Pays Tribute To Doughboy

For every American Doughboy, today, June 15th, will be another high day of honor, without question, the most important of the naval celebrations. There may not even be, for these old’s men, and the more so for the young, a day when the honor is not very important in a modern army.

Visitors on official business had a grand time yesterday at the Centennial Congress of Industrial Alliances. They were almost believing that the Army keep on fighting through years for the same leadership that made the Continental Congress no party. This Fifth War Loan Drive has been noted for Fort Benning, Georgia, who has fought to the end. The Doughboy has gone as far in today's war, the realization of the work, as the Doughboy who has fought to the end. The Doughboy who has fought to the end.

In the modern war, the soldier must be far more careful in his own conduct and his own comfort than in any war ever fought. The soldier must be aware of his surroundings, his position, the enemy. He must be able to move, to fight, to endure. He must be able to survive. The soldier must be prepared for anything. He must be able to fight, to win, to endure. The soldier must be able to survive.

Foot-Soldier Paid Tribute For Vital Role In Combat

Today is Infantry Day which quite fittingly is being observed at Fort Benning where the valiant, dauntless infantrymen are fighting, training and preparing for the tasks ahead in World War II. The infantry, it is said, is the backbone of our fighting forces and it is the infantryman who is responsible for the success of our forces in any battle.

The infantry is the first to fight, the first to be hit and the last to leave the battlefield. They are the eyes and ears of the commander in chief and they are the ones who must carry out his orders. They are the ones who must hold the line and make the sacrifices if necessary.

The infantry is the true fighting men of the Army and they have always been the first to be called upon in time of war. They are the ones who have fought in every major conflict since the American Revolution and they have always distinguished themselves.

The infantry is the backbone of the Army and they are the ones who must be respected and admired. They are the true fighting men and they deserve our highest praise.
